The view is ubiquitous, is described repeatedly, and is completely misguided. This book explores the fundamental contradictions in this interpretation, its inconsistencies in the assignment of ontological status to time dilation versus the opposite for space contraction, its failure to properly factor the reciprocity of systems, the ultimate non-ontological status of the block and thus the non-status of relativity as a theory of time. In this, the work explores the problems for a theory of consciousness and perception inherent in the block, the extensions of certain of the inconsistencies into the foundations of the General Theory, and the origins of relativity in the classic metaphysics of space and time - now outmoded. In contrast to the classic structure, the temporal metaphysics of Bergson...
