Excerpt: .Thus while there is a tendency in one community which is so anxious to secure by any means the utmost number of members, to use even force in proselytizing, and while in others the regeneration imparted in baptism is exaggerated so much as to make other sacraments unnecessary, and which per contra leads to another extremity of denying any regeneration at all, --our Church particularly insists that baptism should be looked upon as the most perfect triumph of human liberty, when the baptized declares his willingness to believe with all his heart, viz., submit himself to the action of the redeeming grace which opens to him the door into the New Testament Church. Therefore, directly after baptism another sacrament had always been and is performed, --that of imposition of hands, which, from time immemorial, was substituted for by Chrism, consecrated by bishops only, and in...
