Excerpt from National Godliness: Sermon, Preached in Park Street Church, on Occasion of the Annual State Fast, April 7, 1864 The object of this day, appointed in accordance with ancient New England custom for public humiliation and prayer, is to bring us as a people penitently and suppliantly to God. If the observance of this day is justly and truly to brighten our national hopes and national prospects, it must be by quickening us to acknowledge in all our national affairs the supremacy of the Most High. Godliness is the great want of this nation, and that is the idea I wish now to impress upon our minds and hearts. We have intelligence enough. At least never before with any people was knowledge so generally diffused among all classes. We have enough of personal liberty, liberty of thought, of speech, of conscience, of published creeds and forms of worship, of secular pursuits and private enterprise.
